Although he found in it much of merit. United States Senator Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio, addressing the American Institute of Banking in the Jefferson auditorium yesterday morning, also found in the Glass-Owen currency bill much to criticize. His views were in many respects the exact opposite of those expressed from the same platform later in the day by Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan, Mr. of State William Jennings Bryan. Mr.
Bryan laid much stress on the importance of keeping the proposed central ance of keeping the proposed central board in governmental hands, opposing the plan to have the bankers of the country name the board that is to concentry name the board that is to concentry name the board on the country name the board that is to concentrate the b unnatural demand.

"The unequal demands of natural and unnatural causes create the need for an elastic currency. Ninety-five per cent of payments are made by check, making much of our banking a mere matter of balancing. The bank note occupies much the same position as a cashier's check or a certified check—a mere paper convenience. The fundamental defect is a lack of elasticity. Our currency must be made to increase and decrease in quantity with the demands of trade. In this respect no advanced country has a system quite methodos in guarded language—How much is it? Government ownership doesn't frighten me except as such utilities as the government might own are likely to be made the football of politics and left in inefficient hands."

Senator Burton closed by commending the objects and motives of the American Institute of Banking, in that its members are giving, not superficial, but careful study to problems of their protections.

"The bankers in all their suggestions have to supervision and recommendations have to supervision measure when it comes to supervision of the banks and most radical examination."

"Under the present plan does it seem to supervision has been made for the expert experience of banking, in that its been made for the expert experience of bankers? It cannot be better illustrated than using this query: If you advanced country has a system quite utilities as the government might own so deficient as our own.
